The EPA groundwater remediation facility at Caroline Avenue Park is still just a shell. But officials expect operations there to begin this summer.

EPA facility takes shape at Caroline Avenue Park

Water treatment plant to begin a quarter-century of operations this summer

Nearly complete is the exterior of the pump and treat plant being built by the Environmental Protection Agency at Caroline Avenue Park in Port Jefferson to remediate the underground toxic plume from Lawrence Aviation, a federal Superfund site.

Inside the structure, behind the residential-like facade with its faux doors, the rooms remain empty of machinery as contractors complete sheetrocking and other interior finishing.

In the rafters, soy-based insulation foam has been sprayed more than six inches thick. EPA's on-site manager Keith Glenn said additional noise control will be installed in the main operations room, where groundwater will be pumped into towering tanks, air-stripped of the volatile organic compounds tainting it, and discharged via two separate pipelines into Old Mill Creek and Old Mill Pond. Noise from the plant, which is designed to operate round the clock for the next quarter-century, has been a concern of residents, Glenn said. And the EPA has taken that into consideration, he assured a reporter.

The plant has a separate control room, office space and a bathroom. Glenn expects it to begin operating sometime this summer. Initially the plant will be staffed on-site but the facility is fully automated and capable of being operated and monitored remotely. It is estimated the facility will have to pump and treat groundwater 24/7 for about 25 years to completely remediate the toxic plume, according to EPA officials.

A similar plant is already operating near the source of the original pollution on the former manufacturing site of Lawrence Aviation Industries on Sheep Pasture Road in Port Jefferson Station.

To save money, Glenn said, the EPA is considering the option of installing used equipment from a similar plant in Nassau County now being decommissioned after a decade of operation. There are many similar EPA-operated facilities across the country and at least five on Long Island, Glenn said.

EPA PLANT

Glenn said an analysis revealed the Caroline Avenue Park location of the plant was "not very beneficial" for roof-mounted solar panels. Still the facility will incorporate a number of green aspects, including geo-thermal heating and a "cool roof," a design that helps stabilize indoor temperatures, Glenn said. The roof, which has not yet been delivered, will be metal bronze, the color selected by the Port Jefferson Beautification Committee. Glenn said he is working with the committee on landscaping the site. At its recommendation, the EPA will install a "living driveway," porous pavement that allows grass to grow across an area covered by pavement.

The exterior siding will be Hardy Plank, a low-maintenance, sustainable material coming from about 170 miles away in Pennsylvania, Glenn said. The plant is not connected to the sewer district. Its bathroom will use a pump-out storage tank.

Government funds have already been allocated to complete the project. However, if Congress shuts down the federal government temporarily, Glenn said work would have to be halted because the EPA is "not allowed to spend any government money when the government is shut down."
